People often think that using tobacco helps them deal with stress, anxiety, and depression.

We know now, that this is a myth!

Studies show that when people stop using tobacco, their levels of anxiety, depression, and stress actually decrease.¹

Smoking affects your body’s ability to process medication. This results in needing to take more medication to get the same results.¹ You may be able to reduce some of your medications, with a provider’s guidance, when you stop smoking.

Take a step toward improving your mental health by addressing your tobacco use.

Your counselor or other health care provider is here to support you. Ask them for assistance quitting tobacco.
